

Novel material design for improved energy saving in subsea applications

Andrew Webley - University of Strathclyde

Abstract

The project has helped to develop a patented insulation material that can be exploited in deep-sea applications. The project investigated the relationship between thermomechanical properties and nano/micro structure in both fibre and particle filled composites. The results are being utilised by our partners (material developer and major subsea contractors) to improve energy saving in subsea environment.